Previous studies on miRNA profiling in the peripheral blood of type 2 diabetic patients suggested that several miRNAs are involved in the development of peripheral complications of diabetes. However, it remains unknown whether there is a relationship between these miRNAs and central nervous system (CNS) disorders. We found that the expression of miR-132 is reduced in the plasma and hippocampus of type 2 diabetic animal models, suggesting that it may have a role in the pathogenesis of brain-related diseases. Our results also showed that several miR-132 targets are involved in the development of CNS disorders, such as Alzheimer's disease (AD). In addition, we found that miR-132 exhibited dominant "dual specificity" and that its expression level in the brain was lower than in the liver. Our study suggests that the altered miR-132 in the brain might be involved in the pathogenesis of brain-related disorders such as AD.Q: How to set the color of specific border, its like the bordercolor?
