P2Y12 receptor (P2Y12R) is one of the most important platelet receptors and its expression is thought to change during chronic coronary artery disease (CAD). This study was designed to determine whether the expression of P2Y12R changes in CAD patients. This study was performed in a randomized, controlled study including 36 patients with CAD and 36 normal control subjects. Peripheral blood samples were collected from the participants to assess the expression of P2Y12R. The expression level of P2Y12R was significantly decreased in the CAD patients compared to the controls ($P = 0.0003$). The expression of P2Y12R in CAD patients was weakly correlated with C-reactive protein (CRP) (P This competing continuation proposal presents strategies for analyzing the medical, demographic and social factors which influence the prevalence of stroke in a community population. The Stroke: Role of Risk Factors, Age and Race Project (STROCSYMPY) is a population-based, multidisciplinary study of 1742 subjects that has been ongoing since 1983. Stroke was confirmed by medical record review, and in most instances, neurological, CT and/or MRI examinations were obtained. Risk factor information was obtained by in-person interview. The purposes of the proposed continuation include: (1) examination of changes in stroke prevalence since the last round of data collection; (2) analysis of stroke rates by race and gender; (3) selection of risk factors which are associated with 'high-risk' or 'at-risk' groups (multivariate analysis); and (4) identification of risk factors which can be changed by specific interventions (multivariate analysis). The risk factors to be examined include: blood pressure, glucose, lipids,
