As the Roman army was marching towards the Alps, the Ligurians ambushed the Romans and pushed their way down the mountainside where the Romans were outnumbered. As the Romans were routed, only 500 escaped and were saved from capture by the Ligurians, whose king, Gabrucio Sértori, was killed. Background In the early 90s, the consul Marcus Fulvius Flaccus had followed the army of Liguria beyond the Gulf of Aquitaine and driven back a rebellion in Gaul. He then crossed into Illyria and defeated the Slavs. For this reason, he was celebrated as the Savior of the Roman People. But the legendary Roman general Gaius met with an untimely death at the Battle of the Allia in 390 BCE, and another consul, Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus, was killed in battle a few years later. The consul for the year 91, Cn. L. Cornelius Cethegus was thus inclined to return to Rome and avoid military service unless he could be assured that the prospects for victory were very good. The Romans had recently defeated and captured the Ligurians on the river Rhône, and Cethegus feared that the Ligurians, with their strong allies, the Celts, would come to the aid of the Gauls. Prelude The army of Cethegus was encamped near the source of the Rhône in the region known as Alpes Cottiae. He had sent a detachment under his loyal supporter Quintus Fabius Vibulanus ahead, who had defeated the Ligurians at an unnamed pass, probably in the region of the Dolomites. Vibulanus had then engaged in some diplomatic negotiations with the Ligurians to avert a war. Defeat In early June 91 BCE, the Roman army was marching along the main road over the mountains towards its winter quarters. It had been divided into two columns 6d1f23a050
